

[Simeon's Big Adventure]

By nw

Perhaps it should be stated.

As I begin this story I know where it will lead. It is where all stories must lead: it is the end for Simeon, for Obsequious, for Selia, for Sebastien, for myself, for you. There are no surprises here. I've always been ham-handed with foreshadowing, and I apologize, I truly do, but as I sit here, with these chemicals coursing through my veins, I cannot help but feel that a basic degree of honesty is in order.

Again, I do apologize. I sincerely promise that I'll attempt to keep the literary devices to a minimum.

An introduction.

The short black car slid through hundreds of miles and a thousand dark fields, its path depressingly clear as it worked its way towards a humble cathedral of bargain halogen lights. It was always the same path, always the same return, always this same stretch back into town. It pulled past hidden off-ramps and turnpikes and broken frontage roads. Tiny filling stations, long disused and forgotten, drifted into the blackness and back into anonymity. There was always the hope of a hitchhiker or a breakdown here: not that you'd stop for them, but at least it would break up the monotony of the endless shoulder-length agriculture. The engine purred irregularly, and a fine layer of dust sat on the dashboard, the console. The paint was speckled with bits of dirt and bird crap and the fenders were riddled with small scars and gouges from too many parking lots. A mile was a mile was another, and if you didn't know the way they would seem pathetically endless.

A small aluminum box passed on the right.

Another.

Another.

Another.

Another.

A steady stream of cheap prefabricated housing, thank god. Civilization was approaching.

A few more miles passed and then asphalt gave way to concrete gave way to asphalt, and he was on the bridge. The river glistened invisibly below for a few moments before it was swallowed by an inch of shore and sweet, sweet urbanity.

Simeon made an effort to wake up and slow down. He reached the speed limit, let the needle creep up a few miles, and tried to stay focused. The city's financial center slowly panned by to his left. He jumped onto the interchange and headed east. He wasn't really thinking about the route, now, he didn't need to anymore, and he honestly didn't remember the next few miles. He caught his exit, jerking the car down to speed, and made his way under the highway and down a lane of old brick buildings flanked by women strolling with lopsided ostrich gaits laughing with pubescent men filled with poisons. There was a VCR repair shop, a small ethnic restaurant, and a carwash that he had never seen open. Another mile and the people disappeared, the lights grew to a steady skyward white, and sprinklers peppered barren parking lots with wasted water. He pulled into one of those lots, killed the engine, grabbed his luggage, staggered up a flight of stairs, fumbled for his keys, unlocked the door, turned the knob, cursed, fumbled for his keys, unlocked the bolt, turned the knob, cursed, and banged on the door for a full minute until it unlocked itself. He turned the knob, opened the door, muttered something to Selia who muttered something to him, dropped his bags, closed the door, locked the door, locked the bolt, locked the bolt, kicked off his shoes, wriggled out of his clothes, and followed Selia to bed, where they both promptly collapsed.

Simeon Cale was home again, and all was well in Lawrence, Kansas.

The Day Begins.

The cylinders in the clock rolled and rolled and rolled and finally hit 2:00 AM.

A small motor turned. The latches slowly retracted and the left half of the bed scissored downward, dropping Simeon's naked form onto a chilled plate of thin steel. Simeon started away, the cold running through his back. He gasped and coughed, choking for air, desperately trying to catch his wind, writhing around on the plate. For a few moments he retreated instinctively into a fetal ball, rolling back and forth like a pill bug in the hands of a sadistic child, trying to minimize his contact with the metal. He found the part of him that liked it, that felt the bite intimately and welcomed it, feeling the shock and the cool pain, hiding in his minority of pleasure. For a moment that worked, he thought he could feel the plate warming to his hip and belly and shoulder when he shifted an inch and it felt like his flesh was sticking and tearing off his muscle. He yelped and rolled sharply to the left, arm shielding his nipple, and slid onto the cool, forgiving concrete. Simeon staggered to his feet. A chill ran down his spine, shaking his body, and he stumbled around in a small circle for a moment, murmuring incoherently to himself.

Simeon looked over at Selia, still lying on her side of the bed in blissful, ignorant slumber. He stood there, heat slowly leeching from his bare feet, staring at her, so innocent and warm. She made a small noise and pulled the thick, soft comforter over her face. He stood and watched for several long moments, his mind slowly trying to digest a mélange of questions and dream fragments and recurring disappointment, and turned, and slowly trudged towards the washroom.

It was another morning.

He made his way to the toilet, dangled his testicles just over the hole and slowly collapsed downward onto it, the paint warming to his butt. A switch flipped and his bladder released itself. He sat for a while, hunched and immobile, emptying into the bowl. When there was no more he reached for a thin washcloth, wiped the urine and sweat from his undercarriage, dropped it into the hole, pulled a lever - at which the toilet exploded into a roar of activity - and lumbered up towards the door, which he threw shut with a swipe of his arm.

Simeon turned towards the wall now and spent a while staring at his face in the mirror, tasting the sleep in his mouth. He looked at his face for a while, searching around the stubble and cheekbones and nose and eventually, for a moment, could see his eyes. This seemed to ground him in himself, warming his thoughts to the next few steps, making him able to instinctively perform the next act.

Simeon turned and shuffled three feet to the right, towards a vertical cylinder in the wall made from cheap semitransparent plastic, grasped the latch, and stepped in. He closed the door behind himself, reached up to manipulate the nozzle in the ceiling directly above him, slid a small level towards the center, and punched a button. A hail of water opened up upon him, instantly drenching him and driving him to his knees with its force. He rolled around in the bottom of the tube for a moment, alternately trying to expose and protect his sensitive areas, gasping as water rolled down his head into his nose and mouth.

The water shut off.

Simeon hacked a bit for a few moments, coughed up some fluid, and rolled into a sitting position. He blinked twice and opened his eyes wide and reach up and started wiping off his rough scalp, slapping at it with his hands like shammies. He grabbed his face and buried it in those hands, squeezing his cheeks and temples hard between his fingers, kneading his face like old dough, and then slid his hand down and into his legs. He sighed heavily and sat motionless for a few seconds, drinking it in, and pulled himself reluctantly to his feet. He reached for a bottle of mild detergent, squeezed a fistful onto his scalp, and methodically worked it down his body. He rubbed it around his scalp, slid it down the back of his head, up around his ears and onto his forehead. Squeezing his eyes shut he rubbed it down his face, around his nose, into his beard, all around his neck. He paused for moment to wipe the detergent from his eyes, opened them, and was immediately overcome with a terrible burning. He winced and closed his eyes, squeezing them rhythmically to flush the bleach out. After a moment he resumed, skimming handfuls of the stuff off his head and rubbing them through his chest and nipples, over the top of his back, down around his arms, back up his arms where he kneaded it into his pits, down his sides, over the small of his back, across his belly, and down into his crotch. He ran the stuff through his pubes, over his penis, and kneaded his balls. He ran his hands back around his butt and into his crack, using the blade of his hand to work it into the ass hairs, using his fingers to gently clean out the rim of his ass. He felt a low burning sensation, but had more or less grown jaded to it. He worked the detergent down over his thighs, behind his knees, over his shins, between his toes. For some reason he ran his fingernails cursorily across his body. There was a pleasant tingling sensation and, after a moment, an unpleasant tingling sensation. He wiped his hands off on his sides, reached up for the nozzle, pushed the button, and was immediately collapsed back onto his knees by the water.

Simeon opened the door, still wiping water from his face, and grabbed an electric blow drier from its hook. He flipped a switch and aimed it at his head, which was immediately hit with a powerful stream of nearly scalding dry air. He winced his eyes shut as he moved it over his face and cringed as it passed his ears. He ran it around his beard for just long enough to smell a hint of singed hair, and moved it across his body, working his way down an erratic semi-spiral towards his penis. He pulled the drier as far as he could while still being effective, making for several long, tense moments before he moved on to his ass. He squeezed one of his cheeks and navigated blindly around his crack with a cautious skill earned by years of experience, and then moved on to his legs. He flipped he switch off, hung the drier back up in its cradle, and emerged from the shower, dry enough that his the residual moisture would evaporate in a few minutes.

He made his way over the counter, grabbed a can of mineral oil, rubbed a small amount into his scalp, and reached for his electric buffer. He paused, the small black unit sitting heavy in his hand, and examined his reflection. There was a thin layer of stubble all across his scalp, particularly pronounced in thin dark lines within the creases of his callous. There were countless white bumps hiding tiny ingrown hairs, and a couple of zits were forming. He looked terrible - after all, he hadn't buffed for days.

Simeon flipped the switch on the machine, which came to life with a low hum, and set the spinning pad down on the very top of his head. He could immediately feel it, grabbing and pulling and twisting and scraping, and moved it in slow circles all around his skull. He worked his way back towards his neck, down carefully the sides behind his ears, up and over and nearly down onto his brow. He pulled it back and tapped carefully at his eyebrows, polishing the hair cleanly off. Simeon ran his hand over his scalp, making note of the spots he'd missed, and gave them another quick pass or two. When he was satisfied he switched the machine off, wiped the oil and hair and skin off of it, and set it back on the counter. He examined himself carefully in the mirror, tilting his head back and forward, slowly rolling it from left to right. It was missing something.

Simeon slid open a drawer and pulled out a small piece of finishing sandpaper. He paused to make sure his head was at just right angle, and gave the left side of his scalp several sharp, rapid swipes. He rolled his head to the left, switched the paper to his other hand, and swiped the right side of his head three or four times. He rolled his head left and right for a moment, thought for a moment, rolled it to the left, hit himself with two quick swipes, rolled his head back and forth again appraisingly, rolled it to the right, hit himself with one particularly sharp swipe, thought about it for a moment, and set the paper down. He carefully, lovingly wiped the debris from it, rinsed the blood from it, dried it, and returned it to the drawer.

He reached into a box sitting on the counter and pulled out a thin, clean washcloth. He ran a bit of water over it, rung it out, swabbed the blood from his head, and set it down. He grabbed another, dabbed the remaining moisture away, and reached for his alum disk, which he dabbed with water and rubbed over his head. It stung as it slid across all the fine abrasions, and stung particularly as it crossed the deep streaks he'd worn into his temples, and the blood quickly caked into deep, handsome black scabs. He rinsed and dried the disk, returning it, and made a quick, light pass with the dry cloth to pick up any stray white bits of alum. He pulled out a small green bottle of designer acetone and dabbed a bit - just a bit! - onto his scalp. He capped the bottle, set it down on the counter, and clapped his hands together. Simeon took a moment to examine himself in the mirror.

Not too shabby!

As he was leaving the washroom he heard a click and a bang, a terrible scrabbling noise of nails on steel and Selia's pained moaning. He stepped into the bedroom, careful to avoid her flailing limbs, and opened his clothes trunk.

Simeon pulled out a cotton pad, which he clenched under his right armpit, and held it tight with a cotton/polyester gauze that he wrapped over and under his shoulder, down across his chest, and tied back onto itself. He pulled out another cotton pad, clenched it in his left armpit, and repeated the process. Selia gasped and let out a small cry.

Simeon pulled out a different length of cotton/polyester gauze, thought about it for a moment, and exchanged it for a length of silk/polyester gauze. He was feeling saucy today! He took one end, wrapped it carefully twice around his testicles, ran it between his right testicle and thigh, through and up across his crack, up over his right hip, around his waist, looped it over itself on his back, brought it back down his crack and between his left testicle and thigh, and tied it off on his waist. Selia shifted onto her left side. She shuddered and sucked in a lungful of air as her nipple kissed the smooth surface of the plate.

Simeon considered his suits. Today felt formal, and a bit classical, so he went with the dark green. He unfolded it methodically, careful to preserve the creases, and put each piece on as if it were a cherished ritual. Which, frankly, it was. He pulled out a pair of straps, sat down, wrapped them around his feet, cinched them taught, and slid on a pair of ebony loafers with suede ribbing. Finally, Simeon stood and opened another chest to find just the right tie for today. He found a two-tone checkerboard pattern that seemed appropriate and briskly strung it around his throat and over his shoulders. Selia whimpered, crawled onto the cool, forgiving concrete, and let out an involuntary shudder. She lay there for a moment staring off blankly at the wall.

Simeon walked out of the bedroom and into the pantry, where he picked out a small package of breakfast cakes, a tube of gel, and a disposable thermos. He opened the tube, squeezed a bit into his mouth, and rubbed it around his gums with his finger. An immediate jolt of energy ran through his system. His digits twitched and he could feel a vein in his neck, and another in his shoulder, throb with a warm vitality, shedding off any last vestiges of fatigue. Yes, it was going to be a good day.

Heading back to the bedroom to the bedroom to say goodbye to Selia, he found her staggering down the hall towards the wash room. He smiled at her puffy face and knotted hair.

"Good morning, bright eyes!"

"Waaash roooooommm..."

He smiled and ran his hand down her naked, unadorned spine in an affectionately perfunctory manner. "Alright," he chuckled, "have a good day."

Selia made a low gurgling sound, and he kissed her on the cheek, turned, and headed for the door.

A few things that might be worth saying.

What do I have to say today?

I find it incredibly difficult to write this stuff, and here we are, only a few pages into the effort. It's not that I can't write anything. Aimless introspection, pointless ramblings about nothing that meander on for pages, congealed thought fragments daisy-chained into an endless moebius-strip circle-jerk – that, I can do. But to approach a body of thought that must have some integration, some coherence, some internal consistency is almost a Herculean task. It's like doing my taxes or writing thank you notes. It's a killer.

I've had a little luck by applying a modicum of common sense to this thing. For starters, I've actually tried to articulate to myself what it is I'm to be writing about, how it's supposed to go, what I think it's all supposed to mean. That's helped. Not a lot, but it's helped. I at least have some idea where I'm going – a terribly concrete idea, really – and that has some use. I'm still driving in little circles around point A, but I know where Omega is. It would be nice, of course, if I had some idea of the route between them, I thought I had some idea of the route between them, but it's turning out to be little more than the notion that I should “head west.” Well, thanks.

For a while I thought that a quota was the key. A fixed period of time, a fixed number of words. That's better than nothing, I suppose, but it's still remarkably open-ended. “Head west, drive five hundred miles a day.” Thank you so much.

What is becoming increasingly clear to me is that I do not need a goal here so much as I need a purpose. Looking at an odometer is just depressing. On the other hand, I find things go more smoothly if I ask myself before sitting down, “What do I have to say today?” What is important? Or trivial? Or utterly unconnected? What is it that is floating around in my head that I can take and congeal into something tangible and pound into the void? What do I have to get off my chest? Or, more modestly, what will get me through tonight without being utterly disappointed with my efforts? Five hundred miles is a drag, but I can at least make it to the next town.

Then you hit a point like this. Nothing. Just nothing. How do you push on through it? You've found yourself in some little ghost town, lost in a web of unmarked broken roads. Congratulations.

God, I hate symbolism. I detest it, I really do. It's always seemed to me an empty artificial conceit. Maybe that just makes me sound like some chain-smoking trailerpark refugee. “Soy sauce? What in the hell is that crap? You haven't been hanging around those chinamen, have you boy? Answer me!” Nonetheless, I can't stand it. Long ago, back in school, I was asked to read The Old Man in the Sea and to explain the symbolism. I said that Hemingway was talking about international terrorism.

I didn't get a very high grade on that assignment.

I want to cut myself open and bleed on the pages. That all sounds very poetic, I guess, but it's really not. I want to take tawdry secrets about myself and put them down here, hide them in plain sight, like a dirty old man standing naked in his window. Somehow, though, I'm just not tawdry enough. I suppose I could blow off this project, join the navy, and spend all of my income on hookers and the curious local intoxicants that all of my toothless friends are raving about, or I could just bleed lies. I wish that was a tough choice. And that's really how you and I have gotten to this point, isn't it? My friend, we're suffering from a profound hooker deficiency. Send help.

Maybe I should have another cigarette, stand in the night air, take a few sips of my drink, watch the spattered traffic, and consider my options. Consider our options.

Oh, god, this is terrible.

Getting on with it...

Simeon grabbed his keys, reached the door, and paused. There was a low, staccato clicking noise, which was unmistakably directed at him. Simeon looked up.

Just above the door was a bald, wrinkly grey creature, its legs splayed in a star, clinging to the wall like a spider. Its tail flowed in an endless sinuous wave and its ears flicked ceaseless backward and forward. Its yellow eyes focused on Simeon, its rectangular pupils dilating to best view him.

"Hello, Tilapia," Simeon smiled. The creature clicked an acknowledgement and skittered down to head-height. Simeon grabbed a handful of the scruff of its neck and kneaded it firmly with his fingers. Tilapia chattered with contentment.

"How are you doing, boy? How are you today?" Tilapia clicked and cooed. "How's my boy today?" Tilapia was lost in bliss.

Tilapia was gay, which was understandable, since that's how Simeon had ordered him. Simeon had found that he preferred gay pets. The operation was no more expensive than a neutering, and he felt it was more humane. They tended to be more affectionate towards him and they retained their spunk, so to speak.

"How are you? How are you? Aw, that's good. Aw, that's right. Who's my boy? That's right. That's right. That's my boy. How's my boy? That's right. That's good. That's right."

Within Simeon's grip and his own, Tilapia was rocking his head and body back and forth, writhing every muscle he could under his loose skin, under Simeon's fingers.

"Are you hungry, boy? Are you hungry? Let's get you something. Let's get you something. Yes, let's get you something."

Simeon wrapped his hands around Tilapia and pulled him from the door. Tilapia clung tenaciously for a moment, then remembered the prospect of food, and released himself. Simeon held him to his chest, which he immediately attached himself to. Simeon carried him to the kitchen, tugged gently at him until Tilapia remembered to let go, and set him on the floor, which he clung to. Simeon rummaged around in a drawer for pet food.

"Let's see... 'Lamb Heart Ceviche,' you had that yesterday, didn't you? Hmm... How does 'Cesos Fiesta' sound? Yeah? Yeah? 'Cesos Fiesta?' Sound good? Sound good? Well, okay then!"

Of course, it wasn't real cesos, and of course Tilapia didn't care what flavor he ate, but Simeon enjoyed the ritual, and Tilapia enjoyed hearing the familiar sound of the top being popped off a disposable bowl. He was happier still when it was set in front of him. He nipped and lapped and swallowed contentedly. Simeon rubbed his back briskly for a moment, whispered a few kind words, called out a farewell to Selia, and left.

A morning at the office, as illuminated by a typical email exchange:

Moving on to other things...

By any reasonable standard, Simeon had a perfectly comfortable life. He put in a typical twelve-hour day at a job that no one quite understood, his supervisors included, at an organization that no one quite cared about, his supervisors included. His office was a meager one-hour commute outside of town. While his salary wasn't remarkable, it was more than enough to keep him in images and amphetamines.

He had a woman he enjoyed. She was plain, but beautiful in her own way, and Simeon liked that. She didn't have any metal or plastic in her, and she had all of her fingers. Simeon had always found typical women to be more trouble than they were worth, and not-so-secretly thrilled at his woman's casual, earthy allure.

He had three friends that he would sometimes meet with after work for eight-balls and smoking and to leer at women, a perfectly respectable social life.

He led an active life. He walked recreationally. He enjoyed several different genres. He hand-rolled his own marijuana cigarettes. His slang was current. He'd watch news headlines sometimes several times a week. He was a member in good standing of a bulk goods wholesaler. On occasion, he'd read.

He wasn't even gay.

By any objective measure, Simeon should have been happy. Mind you, he wasn't miserable: he'd be the first to acknowledge that he was comfortable, and that that comfort went quite a long way. Still, something was missing.

[blah blah blah]

Something was lacking from his life.

More still!

Well, now, where have we gotten ourselves? I'd say we've adequately established the loose parameters around Simeon's life. We have a passable sense of the narrow slice of the world that surrounds him, we sense its character and the dynamics that underlie it. Of course while Simeon's life is hopeless a result of his world, it's not necessarily characteristic of it. Rather, it's simply a characteristic of it, and one might read this and miss the all of the grand variety that exists. We could explore the lives of farmers, of fishers, of men who slice meat. We could explore marketing, money, politics. What of people in other countries? Those who starve, the handful of gluttons who put Simeon and his people to shame? War? Diplomacy? Adolescence? Disease? Prison? Hard labor?

So much to say, so very much to say.

But this isn't really that sort of story, is it? This is Simeon's story, and Simeon's story may be many things, but a sweeping epic it is not. It is a small story of a small life which is, of course, powerfully significant to one person, and of some significance to a handful of others. Please do not misread me. I mean nothing demeaning or patronizing or quaint by that observation. That scale, that scope is as characteristic of Simeon's life as it is of many, many, many others; perhaps all of them. It almost seems, and forgive me if this sounds nihilistic or self-defeating, that the extent to which you influence the lives of others simply cannot belong to you, you must surrender that aspect of yourself to those that you touch. The broader your impact, the thinner your life becomes.

Then again, maybe that's an over-intellectualization. Frankly, maybe that's just bullshit. You and I both know that there is no shortage of rich fuckers who are happy to open or close businesses that employ thousands, to build or destroy economies of towns and states and nations, who think nothing of sending the poor and patriotic off to die, and who are motivated in all of these things by little more than enlightened self-interest. Perhaps some lives simply are more important than others, and no amount of philosophizing about who "owns" their life will really change that base fact.

Well, whatever.

All of that aside, we're simply talking about Simeon. What remains to be said? We could explore a typical day at the office for him – more than we have, anyway – but I'll be honest: that's got to be incredibly boring. Frankly, I'm bored just thinking about it. I imagine there would be a great deal of repetition of things which are, more or less by their nature, simply unamusing. I could try to sex it up, maybe throw in an accident with a binding device or a few gags with some sort of inter-office messaging system, but why? Seriously, why would I want to do that? I don't want to like Simeon's job. I don't want to like it, and I honestly doubt that you do, either. I mean, Simeon's not even thrilled with it – he's comfortable with it, but he wouldn't bother to explain it in more than two or three sentences. His couch is comfortable, too, but I'm not going to write a novel about that.

It's worth noting that we just passed word #6,660. That position may change by the time this is all edited and expanded or pruned and reformatted or simply forgotten, but I feel it's significant within the history of the project. 6,660 is, after all, divisible by 10. It utterly trembles with potency.

Anyway, what were we talking about? His job? Oh, yes, Simeon's job. How would an entire chapter about his job benefit either of us? How would it benefit anyone? Seriously, seriously, how? Why in god's name would anyone want to read that? Why would anyone want to write it?

So, something else, then.

We haven't really investigated his interpersonal relations, now, have we? Yes, yes, there's room for that. There's something to be said there.

As an aside: There are few things more powerful than repetition. If something seems impossible, just do it and it will get smaller. Keep doing it and it will shrink and shrink and shrink. Repetition transmogrifies perception. I suppose that's why some people keep chasing new challenges: given time, their mastery might otherwise turn to comfort.

Simeon's interpersonal relations: an example.

An interlude

A taxi pulled into the middle of an empty lot. It parked and shut off its lights. A small light went on inside the cabin.

A while passed.

A taxi pulled into the middle of the empty lot. It parked next to the other cab, and shut off its lights. The cabin light of the first taxi went off. They rolled down their windows, and sat.

A while passed.

Across the street, Simeon stepped out onto his balcony, shivered in the frigid air, pulled his coat tight, and sat in the nearer chair. He opened up a fresh pack of Jamaican Gold marijuana cigarettes, drew one out, and lit up. He took a deep breath, held it for a moment, exhaled a small, sticky white cloud, and relaxed into his seat.

He sat there a few moments, just staring off into space, thinking nothing, seeing nothing, and then he noticed a star, and remembered where he was. He watched a handful of tiny flashing dots slowly cutting a thin invisible line towards the airport. There was information encoded in that, and for a moment, Simeon wondered what it was. He watched the lights for a while, and then noticed the star again. It twinkled slightly against its halo, again the rich orange-blue of the night sky. He searched the sky for other stars, and found two.

In the night around him, the city opened up and under and over him in flowing waves of rooftops and balconies and darkened windows and radio dishes. Street lights and shop signs rolled endlessly beneath him, dotted with scattered, anemic trees, rippled with power lines, cresting with illuminated billboards, undulating by zoning restrictions, by economics, by history, by fashion. Simeon's corner of this was neither old nor rich nor fashionable, and traffic was sparse around here this late at night. He sat for a time, slowly going through cigarette after cigarette, watching a handful of cars trickle irregularly down the streets like little glistening rivulets of rain. His let his mind wander to think of thin, rambling slices of everything, to think of nothing in particular, shaking softly all the while. And then, once the fingers of his smoking hand had gone comfortably numb from the cold, and his mind and shoulders and back had grown sufficiently soft and pliant, he put the pack and his lighter back into his pocket, found his feet, and went inside to sleep.

A while passed.

The first taxi rolled up its window, started its engine, turned on its lights, and drove off.

A moment passed.

The second taxi rolled up its window, started its engine, turned on its lights, and drove off in the other direction.
